The Marquis s health was visibly on the decline before he left the ship in which he took his passage out, and before he had been many days ashore, his appetite failed him, and he grew progressively worse to the time of his dissolution. He was perfectly aware of his approaching fate some time before its taking place, and employing his declining strength in forming arrangements for the guidance of Sir Robert Barlow, until the arrival of a successor, regularly appointed by government. Though he had complained some days of the loss of appetite, and gradual decay of strength, his attendants were by no means prepared to expect that these symptoms would have terminated so fatally in so short a period. On the evening of the 4th of October, no change had occurred in the (rare of his health, which could indicate his so fast approaching catastrophe; on the contrary, he conversed with his usual cheerfulness, attended...
