Not illustrated. 1891 Excerpt: .plan to use slates, so that the slightest mistake may be erased. Watch the writing of each pupil, sponge in hand, to erase errors. Try again. One sentence, accurately written, is worth pages full of mistakes. Most mistakes are the results of careless habits. Bend all your energies straight toward the correction of such habits. Stop in a reading lesson, and ask pupils to write one sentence about that which they have read.--Wisconsin Journal of Education. Reading. In reading, in the higher grades, the text-book should be studied. A few of the best pieces should be selected; they should be critically examined and their meaning made clear to the pupils. The proper rendering should be insisted on; and the elocution should be made to voice the sense. This is drill. It is no objection that sometimes the pieces are difficult for the pupils. No one advances who does not attempt something a little beyond his present attainments. Reading at sight and for mere entertainment has also its place, but supplementary reading may be carried to excess in our schools.--Supl. A. P. Marble, Worcester. Arithmetic. In teaching arithmetic, we teach not the science of numbers, but figures. Go into any average school, and ask to be shown a number, and the child will go to the board and write a figure; ask for a fraction and he will write --which is no more a fraction than the world hat is a hat. We teach figures and the...
