Excerpt: . . . THE LIFE AND WORKS OF RAPHAEL. The deep significance of Art to the human race, in her two general forms of sound and representation, is a fact which, however obvious, can never be trite. The gift of speech to man in his intercourse with his fellow-creatures is one which he can misuse as he pleases. Accordingly that perversion ensures that the fountain sends forth waters both bitter and sweet. But what we call Art, whether presented to us in mute form and colour, or heard in cunning arrangements of the musical scale, was bestowed on man with an absolute incapacity for the expression of evil. Only when basely linked by him with meanings of his own, foreign to her nature--uttered through rather than by her--can her inherent innocence suffer wrong. Worthily used, she supplies a neutral haven, separate and undefiled, in which man rests...
